Often, as a 'connecting relative', it introduces a new sentence, and this: res loquitur ipsa; quae semper valet plurimum, Cic. In gender, it sometimes agrees with a complement in its own clause: agrum, quae postea sunt Mucia prata appellata, Liv. It is neuter when the relat. clause refers to the whole of the main clause: Lacedaemonii regem, quod numquam antea apud eos acciderat, necaverunt, Cic. In number, it is sometimes plural when the antecedent is a collective noun: equitatum praemittit qui videant, Cic. It is sometimes attracted into the case of its antecedent: illo augurio quo diximus, Cic.

The mood of the relat. clause is normally indic., whenever it makes a purely factual statement about a definite antecedent. But qui is foll. by the subj.: a, to express purpose, in order that: eripiunt aliis quod aliis largiantur, Cic.; b, to express cause, because: recte Socrates execrari eum solebat, qui primus utilitatem a natura seiunxisset, Cic.; c, to express tendency or result, after such words as is, talis, eiusmodi, aptus, idoneus, dignus: ego is sum qui nihil fecerim, such a man as to, Cic.; d, to express a general description, parallel to an adj.: mihi carus et illum qui pulchre nosset, Hor.; e, where the existence of the antecedent is denied or doubted; e.g. after nemo est qui: Cic., etc.

(8) to introduce a concession, although: patrem meum, cum proscriptus non esset, iugulastis, Cic.

R

R, r, the seventeenth letter of the Latin Alphabet, corresponds with the Greek rho (Ρ, ρ). On account of the aspirate which always accompanies the Greek letter, we find it represented by rh in some words derived from that language. The letter r seems often to have replaced, or become an alternative to, an original s, when standing at the end of a word or between vowels; e.g. arbor, arbos; honor, honos; quaero, quaeos; naris, nasus.

For abbreviations in which R. is used, see Table of Abbreviations.

S

S, s, the eighteenth letter of the Latin Alphabet, corresponds in the middle of a word to the Greek sigma (Σ, σ, ς), at the beginning of a word to the Greek aspirate; e.g., sex=ἑξ, sal=ἅλς, serpo=ἐρπω. When standing between vowels it was occasionally interchanged with r (e.g. quaero, quases). At the end of a word it was often dropped by poets of the older period, e.g. vitā illā dignū locoque, and in such conversational forms as ain, satin. By assimilation, the s of dis before f becomes f, as difficilis; it combines with gutturals to form x (e.g. rex=regis).

For abbreviations in which S is used, see Table of Abbreviations.
